Other comments

31. Are there any other comments that you would like to make?

People going to health and safety representative training courses are coming from good health and safety-focused businesses, so the courses are not getting the people on them that need the training the most. More public education is needed about the resources available to support people to go on the courses. Small business's are generally the ones that would benefit most from H&S Rep training

An advertisement/programme is needed around community safety, just like has been done for drug and alcohol abuse, drink driving and driver fatigue. Australia has a good model "Will you be home tonight". We need to engage employees, employers and the community at large around the social costs of workplace accidents. The cost to family, fun and futures not just finances.

There is often minimal health and safety knowledge amongst owners of new businesses. When a new business is set up, it should be required that the owners/managers have to demonstrate that they have some minimum level of health and safety knowledge "e.g. that they have done some unit standards / a course. This could possibly be an online e-learning type course.

There should be more focus within the education system on safety by design, and penalties for not considering health and safety in the design phase. For example, roof structures could be designed so that they don't need to be put together at height. Process considerations need to consider safety issues e.g. Manual handling issues removed through automation.

There should be more codes of practice that tell people what they need to do to be safe. The legislation is not prescriptive enough for companies without H&S personal.

There should be clear definitions "for example, on what 'all practicable steps' means; serious harm; etc. Plain English regulations / legislation is needed.

Linking good health and safety practice to good business principles is needed. Education for business around the links between good H&S performance and all other measures of good business performance.
